Social Theory and the History of Ideas

Interest in social theory began as a graduate student. One of the principal debates of the time was the place of white-collar workers in Marxist class analysis and the conditions under which class consciousness developed. In 1983, I prepared a number of commentaries on theories of the middle class, white-collar unionism, and state employment. While teaching a graduate seminar in intellectual history at Beijing Foreign Studies University in 1995-96, in the absence of suitable readings, I began work on a manuscript on the foundations of social theory from Aquinas to about World War One (2006). Oxford published a second edition in 2010. A companion manuscript on critical, modern social thought appeared in 2016. In addition, chapters summarizing sociological theory (both classical and modern) have appeared in two editions of two related introductory sociology texts.

Marxist Social Theory

Drawn into left politics in the late 1960s and 1970s, I have maintained a long-term interest in Marxist analysis and the fate of Marxism over the last century and have written on some aspects of Marxist theory and politics. I am currently collaborating on a book with Herb Gamberg and Ma Zhanbin reconsidering our previous writings and ideas and discussing key questions in Marxist theory.

Ideology and the Canadian Penitentiary System

In 1977 and 1978, I collaborated on a research project funded by the Non-Medical Use of Drugs Directorate (Canada). The research focused on the Canadian penitentiary

System and particularly on the development of the rehabilitative ideology in Atlantic Canada.

Unionism and the Public Sector in Nova Scotia

Between 1978 and 1987, I researched aspects of the labour movement in Nova Scotia, most intensively the history of civil service unionism, in the context of theoretical investigations into the middle class and state employment. A case study of hospital workers in Nova Scotia (prepared as a PhD dissertation) tested the connection between occupational position and trade union consciousness. After more than a decade of unrelated research on the justice system, with Mike Earle and with assistance from Jason Doherty, we developed a manuscript summarizing Nova Scotia labour history and integrating an anthology of articles from New Maritimes as part of a history of the labour movement in Nova Scotia. The most recent project considered the question of union renewal in the context of changes in the economy of the Atlantic region.

Social History of the Penitentiary in the Maritimes

A long-term, still unfinished research project on the history of penitentiary development in the Maritimes began initially in 1986 and expanded in 1995 with the help of grants from the SSHRC. I have accumulated considerable archival material on jails and penitentiaries in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick (prior to Dorchester Penitentiary) as well as some information on PEI and Newfoundland. Some preliminary observations on the Nova Scotia Penitentiary were presented in 1986. This project is in limbo at the moment with no plan to reopen the research.

NOTE: These documents on prison history are in a preliminary stage, either only a compilation of notes or a rough early draft of these notes. They are here for readers' interest, but they are not to be cited or borrowed.

Information has been centralized in the following works in progress:

Community Policing: Small Town and Rural Policing in Nova Scotia

In 1987, beginning in a sabbatical year, I began collaboration on a long-term co-operative study of Community-Based Policing (CBP). The study, through the Atlantic Institute of Criminology (AIC) at Dalhousie University, included researchers from Dalhousie and UNB-Saint John, and was financed by grants from the Donner Canadian Foundation, the Law Society of Nova Scotia, and the Solicitor-General, Canada. My research focus was small town and RCMP policing in the Annapolis Valley, Nova Scotia. The study included a public survey of rural victimization and attitudes to policing as well as an ethnographic study of small town and R.C.M.P. policing. I undertook this research intensively until 1992 and have continued sporadically to research policing, including supervising an MA student's research on CBP in Nova Scotia and Alberta (2001), analyzing UCR data from the Canadian Centre of Justice Statistics for the separate Valley jurisdictions, as well as data on perceptions of crime and policing in Kings County, collected by the General Progress Index. This work has resulting in the following monographs, papers, and an unpublished AIC manuscript:

Restorative Justice in Rural Nova Scotia

In 1998, the Department of Justice in Nova Scotia initiated a province-wide Restorative Justice programme. In 1999, I began collaborating with Donald Clairmont (Dalhousie University) on an evaluation of this initiative, interviewing stake-holders to elicit their concerns about the evaluation of the initiative and potential issues they identified in its implementation. We conducted research on restorative justice in rural Nova Scotia (Kings and Cumberland counties) as part of the provincial study, during the implementation phase and the first two years of operation of the programme. In 2007, I became a collaborator on an SSHRC-CURA project originating at the Dalhousie Schulich School of Law studying the restorative justice programme in Nova Scotia. My focus was on rural/urban differences.
